SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

Overview: NIC's Executive Leadership for Women in Corrections program provides executive women leaders with critical competencies, self-awareness, and the confidence necessary to seek higher levels in an organization and perform their leadership responsibilities effectively. The program addresses three main objectives: Correctional leadership, barriers and promotional strategies, and career and life planning. Three assessment instruments (LSI, MBTI, and Change Style Indicator) with individual feedback, classroom presentations, and tabletop and outdoor activities center around the core set of developmental competencies. The developmental competencies were based on a gap analysis comparing the boss/peer/subordinate scores on each competency of the LEADERSHIP 360, a set of eight leadership abilities commonly found among most outstanding leaders. These scores were compared against the midrange point of a future leadership competency set. The result of this analysis provided the basis for three major competencies—strategy, communication, and consent—which are to be incorporated into NIC’s new “Strategies for Women Executives in Corrections.”

Additionally, over the last five years, NIC’s Executive Leadership for Women in Corrections program has kept current with recent trends such as those that appear in the multigenerational workforce and that are noted in the NIC Correctional Competencies publication.

Background: The National Institute of Corrections Prisons Division offered the first Executive Training for Women program in 1994. The program was designed to address both the personal and professional aspects of women’s correctional leadership in a nontraditional profession. Through a two-part series, NIC has sought to close the gap for women executives in their knowledge, recognition of their value to the organization, and self and observer perception.

Although the past three decades have witnessed a tremendous increase in the number of women working in corrections, increasing numbers of women in the workforce have not been matched by corresponding advancement in executive and senior level leadership positions. Women are underrepresented in senior level (CEO) leadership positions across all professions, but they are significantly underrepresented in the corrections field. To further complicate the issue, studies have found that few women have had the same quantity and quality of leadership development opportunities and experiences as men, thus thwarting their ability to compete adequately for higher level positions.

By 2012, women will comprise 47.5% of the workforce. With the anticipated rise of women in the ranks of senior level positions, NIC continues to build upon the success of its programming for a women’s-only environment, where gender barriers are eliminated and acceleration of learning is possible.

The occurrence of strategic partnerships within and between organizations is on the rise. In a time of a changing workforce, security issues, technology advances and new government regulations, it is imperative that organizations and individuals learn to adapt. Getting individuals to do things differently is the measure of success or failure. Approaching leadership strategically is a learned skill. Forward-looking organizations proactively seek ways to advance the leadership capacities of the women they promote, or intend to promote, to senior and executive administration.

Target Audience: Women who are senior, upper-level correctional managers serving in jails, prisons, and community corrections, functioning administratively at the level of warden or superintendent and above, and who wish to enter the ranks of chief executives of state departments of corrections.

Intended Program Results: This program will assist women leaders in understanding their value to, and involvement with, moving themselves and an organization forward. It is an acknowledgement for their way of learning and thinking, without judgment. It is to provide the tools necessary to become more self aware, more strategic in assessing and isolating critical problems, more mission driven, politically savvy, and adept at teaming with others for success. The program also takes into account the best learning environment, the best setting for the greatest outcome, and a way to close the gap for women executives in their knowledge, self-awareness, and observer’s perception of their value to an organization.

Learning Outcomes: It is intended that leaders will: Acknowledge the need for, and rely upon, the support system of other professionals who can offer feedback and advice; develop appreciation for teams, teamwork and the application of strategic teaming; extend their abilities to evaluate themselves and address their needs for developing mastery of the skills required in executive leadership; and grow in their understanding of self.

Products and Deliverables: A training curriculum designed with ITIP model instruction, which will contain an instructor/facilitator’s guide with associated tools, materials, and resources with a final, agreed upon curriculum delivered to NIC no later than December 31, 2011; a participant resource guide to be used in conjunction with all training activities; instructional aides and materials, including presentation slide shows, CDs, charts, handouts, case studies, assessments, etc. to support instruction and facilitation; and training delivery and facilitation of a 36-hour classroom training for 20 participants with blended learning tools.
